Share Your Knowledge With Others

Introduction

You have learned about your First Nation's housing rules and regulations! Now it is time to share this information with your community. How will you get the word out?

Instructions

You will need to decide how you want to share information about the housing rules and regulations in your First Nation. You can choose to create a poster, a brochure, a public service announcement, or even a website!

Here is the information you need to include in your project:

- What is a housing policy, and why is it important?
- What is in a housing policy?
- What are the roles and responsibilities of housing occupants?
- What are the roles and responsibilities of housing departments?

Make sure you give many examples to help others understand your work!

Use the space below to record some of your ideas.

Poster

Your informational poster should be large enough for someone to read. The title should be big enough to be read from far away.

What kinds of images will you include? How will you make your poster visually appealing? These are some things to think about as you get started.

Brochure

Have you ever seen a brochure advertising a place or an activity before? Brochures usually try to present small chunks of information in an exciting way. They use a combination of text and images to keep the reader interested.

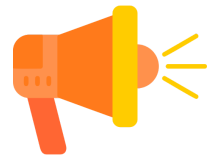

As you design your brochure, think about how you will attract someone's eye to it. Brochures usually fold as well, so consider this when you decide where to place your information.

Public Service Announcement

A public service announcement (PSA) is a short audio (like radio) or video announcement to raise awareness about something. Usually, a PSA is catchy and might even contain a jingle or song!

Get creative with your PSA. How will you raise awareness about housing in your community?

Website

One way you could inform community members about your First Nation's housing policy is by creating a website. There are free sites to do this, such as Wix or WordPress. If you create a website, you might want to work with a partner or small group to add information and images.

Think about making it easy for community members to find information on your website as you design it.
